Justin Case : The Joyful Techno-tard before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised The Joyful Techno-tard:

A pretty cool book for all us low-tech people living in this high-tech world. In the Roman Empire, around the year 5 AD, times were changing. The Pax Romana had created security, freedoms, and opportunities previously unheard of. A group of inventors exhibited a new invention for Caesar Augustus—a crude steam engine with multiple applications (apps). After a season of considering the benefits of the steam engine, Caesar concluded to have it destroyed. His reasoning: It would put thousands of unskilled and uneducated people out of work. So, it would be sixteen hundred years before the world would have its' steam engine. In a slightly different way and considering computers instead of steam engines this book takes a new and hopefully light-hearted look at Caesar's dilemma.
